Relative contraindications include extensive adhesions, immature previous scars, and severe posttraumatic underlining arthrosis. Tendons from the FDS insert on the base of the middle phalanx of each finger to flex the finger at the metacarpophalangeal (MCP) and PIP joints. The FDP inserts into the base of the distal phalanx and flexes the finger at the MCP, PIP, and distal interphalangeal (DIP) joints. Not all fingers are capable of independent movement in every individual, because the tendons from the FDP are usually connected proximal to the individual fingers, the only common exception being the tendon to the index finger. Good strength in flexor and extensor muscles of the hand, as well as intact nerves to flexor muscles. The first annular pulley, A1, lies at the head of the metacarpal bones, whereas the second through fifth annular ligaments, A2-A5, all attach to the bones on the finger. The cruciate ligaments generally are smaller than annular ligaments and are found between annular ligaments. Together, the cruciate and annular ligaments make a tunnel through which normally the flexor tendons pass. Normal active tendon function requires that flexor tendons be able to glide smoothly within their tendon sheath. Damage to these tendons can necessitate surgical repair, and tendon adhesions can develop despite successful surgical tendon repair, appropriate postoperative management, and compliance with physical therapy.
